Psychology is concerned with the scientific study of human behavior and consciousness, and the applications of these findings to the areas of home, school, work, and social relations. It covers topics such as learning, cognition, motivation, personality, psychophysiology, sexuality, group processes, cultural factors, and abnormal behavior. A large number of psychology graduates are employed in business and administration, education, and social services. The B.A. degree does not train a person to work as a professional psychologist. However, a number of jobs related to psychology can be entered without advanced education. Some examples are employment interviewers, personnel managers, market researchers, management trainers, probation officers, and mental health workers.
